The Sun Short Story

THE RELAPSE OF MISS TURNER.

BY JESSE LLEWELLYN.
(Copyright, 1901, Daily Story Pub. Co.)

"It was a sad affair," announced the wistful Miss Turner, stifling a yawn, as she sank back into the cushioned carriage.

"Sorry, but I don't exactly appreciate your point of view," answered the maid beside her. "I thought it jolly."

"Perhaps if I were a 'horsy' person like that Miller woman it would not have been such a bore, or if I cared about making myself a walking, talking, sitting advertisement for some medico. Of course I enjoyed my splendid pair strolling about so nobly as though ennobled by their precious bit of blue ribbon. You know, Tom, horses have souls. Prof. Blumstein spoke so eloquently about the other day at the club."

"What, about the prize winners?"

"No, no, animals having souls—reincarnation, you know."

"Rot," Tom began, but checked himself in time and only whistled.

"You are so indifferent, Tom, to the things I am most interested in."

"Aren't you the same regarding the things I am interested in? The horse show, for instance. It was splendid. Those well-bred, polished beauties, with their alert, quivering nerves, their prond necks and their fancy gaits. I say, how could anyone be indifferent?"

"Oh, the horses were well enough, she admitted, "but the people—like children dressed for their first birthday. Actually, the three Winslow girls, in the horse show, spoke during the entire evening. One more once a trifles, and I saw a tragic look of pain come over poor mouth-eaten Miss Winston's face. I am tired of it all; the mahogany souls and peppermint faces of the good-est good and the sticky smiles of the divorcees."

"Your description savors of vices," he said, rudely.

"Fee, and I'm going to include you, Tom."

"There was a pause in which the regular beat of horse's feet on the pavement emphasized the conspicuously vicious rubber tires of many carriages. Then Tom said abruptly: "Why too? It's my soul also wooden?"

His emphasis of the word "soul" irritated Miss Turner, resenting as she did his persistent refusal to mention her hobby.

"Not exactly that, Tom, but what's the use? Here we have gone on being engaged for two years—"

"And whose fault is it that it's been only engaged?"

"All the time," resumed Ruth, "I have been hoping you would come to regard life more seriously. But it really isn't worth while any more. You enjoy this sort of thing—it's your life. I prefer to study—to really amount to something—to give my soul a chance."

Tom Marston groaned.

"I've been hoping, too, Ruth," he said, presently, "hoping that you would recover from this attack of soul—of soul. I can't see what good you do yourself or anyone else in this settlement business, mixing up in other people's affairs one is called them."

"It's no use to talk," sighed Ruth.

"Tom said suddenly, "No, don't wait; that's Mama in the carriage back there, and you're going to be late."

"Tom!" exclaimed Ruth, pleasurable wonderment in her bearing. "It was my thought message, you know."

"It's no use to talk," sighed Ruth.

"Where's Tom running out to in such a hurry?" queried Miss Turner, as they mounted the broad steps. "I wanted to ask him in to luncheon tomorrow."

"It's broken off," said Ruth, with a little catch in her voice. "Perhaps she had been too hasty after all. Being a wise woman, Mrs. Turner's documents were altogether mental, though somewhat involved in guess work."

For five long weeks Ruth adhered to her resolution to eschew society, the higher life.

She read a great many treatises, perhaps a great many books which she did not understand. On Mondays and Wednesdays she attended Mother's meetings in a Settlement house in the slums, where she sang Novello's songs and played brilliant piano solos by Cheminade. Fridays she attended the Eclectic Club and studied how to release her soul from the material body.
